Ending the Troubles In Northern Ireland: The Good Friday Agreement, Ten Years Later

Irish Consul General Martin Rouine and British Consul General James Clark will discuss the Good Friday Agreement of 1998, which established the framework for local and collaborative government in Northern Ireland and brought an end to a generation of violence and discord. Today Northern Ireland is governed peacefully by its residents, with elected officials coming from different backgrounds and traditions to continue building a peaceful future for all – Unionist and Republican, Protestant and Catholic.
